Excerpt from Monographs on American Social Economics: I the Social Economy Exhibit at the Paris Exposition of 1900

The following discussion of the plans for the social economy exhibit at the Paris exposition of 1900 is the introduction to a series of monographs on American social economics. The entire series will be used as a basis for illustration in preparing the social economy exhibit for Paris, and will be published under the authority of the United States Commission in time for the exposition. This introductory monograph is divided into three distinct parts: I A chapter intended to show by means of a few typical illustrations that international expositions are a powerful factor in social economic progress. II A chapter tracing the history of the social economy group to its origin in the classification of the Paris exposition of 1855, presenting some of the salient characteristics of the exhibits in this group in 1855 and at later expositions, and closing with an account of the plans for the social economy exhibit at the Paris exposition of 1900. III A chapter containing a brief introduction to American social economics. This chapter has been prepared with two purposes in view: 1) to present an outline of the systematic classification which has been used in collecting the social economy exhibit; and 2) to present an outline of the plan for the series of social economy monographs. The Commissioner General for the United States is deeply interested in the social economy group, and has authorized the Department of Education and Social Economy to prepare an exhibit which shall be worthy of comparison with similar exhibits shown by other great nations.
